In conclusion I should like to thank the firm of Messrs. Felton, Grimwade, and Co. for permission to communicate the results of this work, which was done in their research laboratory. 8. --NOTES ON THE BEHAVIOUR AND ELIMINATION OF CERTAIN IMPURITIES IN COPPER SMELTING AND REFINING. By G. C. McMURTB, A. R. S. M. , A. R. C. Sc. The presence of small amounts of impurities in copper has often a marked effect on the character of the metal, rendering it more suitable for some purposes than for others. In the metallurgy of iron and steel the influence of these small amounts of other elements is well known, and their presence or absence entirely alters the character of the product produced. But with copper very much remains to be done in the direction of ascertaining the action of these impurities. The cause of this branch of the metallurgy of copper being so neglected is largely due to the fact that the average consumer of the metal often knows nothing of the reason why one brand of copper in the market is more suitable for his work than other makes. It is well known, for instance, that a copper containing a fair amount of arsenic is more suitable for such purposes as rolling-plates for the fire boxes of locomotives, or for the manufacture of commercial copper wire, but such copper could never be used for electrical work, and would also be unsuitable for...
