Excerpt: . . . that, industriously as they were persevered in for near three hours, - Clarentine could not fail to observe them, The--only affect, however, they had upon her mind was that of leading her sincerely to compassionate her mother--a mother W510, unentertaining and uncultivated as she might be, it was still evident--possessed many qualities that rendered her deserving of a better daughter. THREE days had now elapsed since the departure of Mr. Lenham; and Clarentine, though in that time she had hourly gained ground in the good opinion of Mrs. Barclay, began most impatiently to long for his return, when the following letter from--him was brought to her: Inss DELMINGTON. . Somerset Hall, July 26th. My dear young Friend, -- The intelligence I have to announce to you it was my wish to communicate in person, but the probable delays that will protract my-return are so numerous, that I cannot any longer, possessing a secret which I think it will give your benevolent heart pleasure to be informed of, permit myself to keep you in ignorance. Mr. Somersets will, you have already heard, has been inspected. It was drawn up, as is evident by the date, three years since, and excepting a few trifling legacies to servants, contains nothing that does not relate to his son. In a codicil, however, which was added to it so lately as within four days of his decease, is a declaration, stating, that, In consideration of, -Clarentine Delmingtons near affinity to his late wife, the testator gives and bequeaths...
